

Y&G co-editors react to weekend

We all participate in Y&G because we care.

We love it so much that it would be a sin if we did not come back the following year.

Maybe this is why we can never seem to graduate anybody – they always seem to reappear the next year anyway.

Sure, most of the underclassmen are eagerly anticipating next year's assembly.

(Basically, this is Christmas for us political nerds.)

In addition, I cannot deny that most of the seniors are praying that their future college's Spring Break just so happens to fall around the time of the 63rd Youth General Assembly. (I know I am.)

Nevertheless, a large dose of perspective is needed for all of us infected with the Y&G disease.

I hate to break it to everyone, but we have 361 days until the beginning of the next Assembly.

You can do anything you want to with an entire year stretched out in front of you: participate in a sport, write a story or two, get lost in the music, or dance your life away.

The biggest way to pass the time until the next Assembly is just to get involved.

Many of us are not one-trick ponies.

We do other things too.

Take it from someone who never seems to be busy, and yet never has free time either – just have fun.

Trust me, the cliché is true. Time really does fly when you're having fun.

This year's Y&G assembly should have been made into a movie. There was so much drama, so much entertainment, and so much attitude. We had prima donnas walking around everywhere acting like they owned the place. Also this year, there was a record for the amount of undesirable and obnoxious males.

Females are known for being high maintenance but this year was a stand-out year.

Every time I walked by a group of girls, it all consisted of drama and complaining.

The main complaint I heard was the cafeteria food is awful. Really girls? Food is food. If you are hungry you will eat.

You know if you are a returning delegate that the cafeteria food is cafeteria food.

Another standout topic this year was boys. Yes girls, it is almost prom time but quit stressing about the guy you would like to ask you to prom.

Girls were hoping they would get asked to prom at Y&G. Girls, if you are so worried about getting asked to prom, take the initiative and ask the guy yourself.

The males this year were exceptionally entertaining. We had some bubbly and eccentric personalities this year. Mandatory fun night was when we saw the real side of the guys.

Guys were looking for some fun out on the dance floor and it showed.

We had guys showing off everywhere, which was a change from last year.

In the end, I'm glad the attitudes of the guys made up for the attitudes of the girls.
